BAPTISM initiates the believer into the community of Christ: The mystical being-in-Christ effects communion with each other, the mystical body of Christ, which comprises a new society. Baptism establishes a fundamentally new direction in life and in addition empowers the believer to follow that direction and live henceforth a transfigured life of grace. Baptism effects a reconditioning of consciousness and a change in allegiance. The external act of being immersed in water is symbolic of an inner spiritual regeneration. 'The creative presence of God, a presence which permeates the created personality and can be known by reason, becomes through baptism a personal self-giving which can be answered in mutual relationship, a communion, the presence of a friend to a friend ' (Elizabeth of the Trinity). There is a liminal dimension to baptism: there is a threshold to be crossed in moving from one stage of being or social status to another. There is a new and unprecedented society which arises as a result of baptism, which no longer adheres to the prevailing norms of the times. The baptismal community is clearly manifested in the sharing of a sacred, sacramental meal, an anticipation of the celestial banquet, experienced mystically in the present. Breaking bread and drinking wine in fellowship indicate that social, cultural and economic barriers are abolished in Christ.
